In the event of war breaking out between China and Japan some delicate questions would arise as to the extent to which the respective countries should be allowed to exercise the orginary rights of belligerents A few days ago it was believed that a peaceable solution of the dispute over Korel was practically assured, but later news received is more disquieting and the apprehension of hostilities has been revived. The probabiliclosing of the Melapi and Segaliud Estates. lities are that should they come to blows both countries will be desirous to avoid giving | serve a report that several cases o plague have cause of offence to other Powers by vexations. proceedings in respect of neutral trade. would be unwise to count on this, however. If one of the belligerents succeeded in wiping out the fleet of the other its own vessels would then be available for the purposes of blockade should the other party still refuse to submit to terms. At the commencement of the war both fleets would be too busily engaged in watching each other to be able to establish any blockade of the enemy's own free will to enter again. There seems ports, but after a time, when one had possibly secured a distinct advantage, a different state of things would arise. In such case would Japan be allowed to establish a blockade of, sav, Shanghai, or conversely China to establish a blockade of Yokohama? According to the laws of war the right to do so would be unquestionable, but it is not to be supposed that the Treaty Powers would stand aside and look quietly on while trade was being unnecessarily and wantonly possess the right to visit and search I have just heard that Perkins and Willis, continues in that direction.
